Sunday Dinner Parties in England.

London World.

Politicians resemble players in many respects: it is their business to stimulate passion, and to suppress or display sentiment, as may suit their convenience. They have also the same secial interest in the Sab, both They are sit down to their bath. They can sit down to their dinners upon that day, and on no other, with a comforting conscious-ness that the summons of the callboy, or the sound of the divisionbell, will not be audible. Sunday dinners have increased and multiplied during the last few years in a very appreciable degree. Among actors the Sabbath has always been devoted to social enjoyments. To politicians it has presented the same opportunities, but it is only of late that these have been thoroughly understood and extensively utilized. Fifteen or twenty years ago Cabinet ministers were not in the habit of entertaining, or of being entertained, to anything like the same extent that they are at present. The political dinner-party on Sun-day has become as much of an institution as the theatrical. The late Lord Besconsfield was specially fond of these feasts, and there is no doubt that his example and influence went far toward popularizing them in the ranks of his party. Just as Sunday has become a great day at the political clubs of London, so it is—and, for that matter, always has been-a great day at the literary and theatrical clubs. The hospitable little private dining room at the Garrick is always in demand on the Sabbath; and if its walls, crowded as they are with interesting pictures, could only speak they would tell tales and record conversations which would be invaluable to the social historian of the epoch.
